The Discremination of the House of Commons.

(Frem the London Spectator.)

It is a remarkable sign of the political times, and not one of good omen, that now, for the third or fourth time, the leaders of parties in the House of Commons have taken to counting the specehes of individual members. We are far indeed from blaming either Lord Hartington or Sir Stafford Northcote for the computation 'they produced to' the House of Commons yesterday week. It was quite right that the speeches should be counted. Lord Hartington could not have brought the real state of the case more powerfully before the House than by the striking ad absurdum argument which he submitted to it. If all the members were to speak at the rate of the selected members, he said, then if you allowed ten minutes for each speech, an ordinary sixmontha' session would last over eight years; while if the speeches only occupied frontial while if the speeches only occupied five minutes each, such a session would occupy four years, "which," as he justly remarked, after Euclid's fa-blon, "is ab-

It follows, then, either that some mode must be invented of keeping silent the increasing number of representatives who wish to talk, or else that parliamentary work on anything like the scale needed will become wholly impossible. The reason we call the tendency to count speeches and to obtrude the statistics of such computations as the House opinous is this. It shows that obtrude the statistics of such computations on the House ominous is this: It shows that the House of Commous is losing the very peculiar characteristic by which alone it was fitted to do what it did—the comparative apathy, the relative tacituruity, the preference for discussions conducted through a few selected combatants, the obedience to a few fixed centres, which once marked the great majority of its members. The late Mr. Bagehot, in a celebrated passage, drew attention to the paradox of our form of government some fifteen years ago; and ever since he wrote, that paradox ago; and ever since be wrote, that paradox in form has been growing nearer and nearer to what bids fair to be a fatal paradox in to what bids fair to be a fatal paradox in fact—an intolerable combination of practical inconsistencies that may wreck the Constitution. "Of all odd forms of government," he said, "the oddest really is government by a public meeting. Here are 658 persons collected from all parts, different in nature, different in interests, different in look and language. If we think what an empire the English is, how various are its components, how incessant its concerns, how immersed in history its policy; if we think what a vast information, what a nice discretion, what a consistent will ought to mark the rulers of that ent will ought to mark the rulers of that empire—we shall be surprised when we see them. We see a changing body of miscellaneous persons, sometimes few, sometimes many, never the same for an hour; sometimes excited, but mostly dull and balf-weary—impatient of eloquence, catching at any joke as an alleviation. These are the persons who rule the British empire—who rule England, who rule Scotland, who rule Ireland, who rule a great deal of Asia, who rule a great deal of Asia; deal of Asia, who rule a great deal of Polynesia, who rule a great deal of America, and scattered fragments everywhere. * * You have not a perception of the final elements in this matter till you know that government by a club is a standing wonder." It is, no doubt, a standing wonder still; but it threaters to become an exploded wonder, a wonder of the past, before long, if things go on as they now do. Directly we begin to count they now do. Directly we begin to count speeches, to show, as Lord Hartington showed most conclusively, that if all members of Parliament acted as an increasing number of members of Parliament are now acting, we shall require sessions of between four and eight years to do what we have ting unfit for its work, and that, too, partly by becoming, from one motive or another, worthy, or unworthy, too much interested in it.

The oid notion in Parliament was that the duty of the many was to vote, and only of the few to speak. Farther, it was assumed that each of the few to speak. Farther, it was assumed that each of the few to speak. Farther, it was assumed that each of the few to speak. Farther, it was assumed that each of the few to speak. Farther, it was assumed that each of the few to speak that the distribution is made to sold cheating to seat the sold each of the few to speak that that even of those who habitually spoke and exerted real Parliamentary influence only a certain proportion would speak on great occasions, the others reserving themselves for criticisms of detail and matters of business. All that is changing now. The silent voters are diminishing, and the voluble speakers increasing. Nor is that the worst. Even amongst the speakers the worst. Even amongst the speakers the number of those who speak on all possible occasions, on great occasions even more than on small, is increasing rapidly; and worst of all, perbaps, the speeches delivered on the more critical issues before the House are not even thinned off by the prevalence of a general opinion that they ought to show substantial cause for their own existence; that they should at least own existence; that they should at least preadth, and impressiveness. We have a rapidly-increasing number of very poor rapidly-increasing number of very poor and empty speeches, delivered on oc-casions which ought to be regarded as critical occasions—the talk of inferior minds-talk which-passes through the ears of the House without even so much as hoping to rivet the attention of the House. It is not, so far as we can judge, that the House is inferior in its composition to what it used to be; but rather that its individual elements are more uneasy in their hold of their position, more anxious to justify it to their constituents, and much justify it to their constituents, and much less disposed than they used to be to respect the collective opinion of the body to which they belong. The inferior elements of the House, except among the Irish members, are, perhaps, rather more intelligent than the inferior elements of any former House; but it is a terrible set off against this that they are also much less conscious this that they are also much less conscious of their inferiority, and less modest about it; while even the abler men appear to think it easier to win attention by speaking often, and speaking without any serious effort, than by speaking seldom, but taking care that whenever they do speak they make themselves felt.

The number of great speeches dwindles every Parliament, and the number of "observations" multiplies. The elever menexhale in witty strictures, without any body of conviction. The stupid men are perhaps less stupid than they were, but unfortunately much more disposed to share with the House the misfortune of whatever stupidity they can still boast. And thus the House of Commons generally, though it may not have lost—though it may even have gained, in average intelligence, has lost vastly in organization. There may be more nervous centres than there used to be, but then there is far less government, far less directing force, in the chief nervous centres. To use a physiologithere may be more hervous centres than there used to be, but then there is far less government, far less directing force, in the chief nervous centres. To use a physiological metaphor, there is more done by the ganglia, and less by the brain; in other words, there is more mental stir, and much less of directing intellect. The Treasury Bench does not exercise so much authority as it used to do. The Front Opposition Bench does not exercise so much authority as it used to do. "Third" and "Fourth" parties exercise a little authority, but not much; while a host of individuals on both sides act independently, and with as much perturbing effect on the organization to which they are supposed to belong as there would be in a hive of bees with—were that possible—about four queens and a hundred or so of quasi-independent working-bees, who only obey orders when they please, and resist them when they please.

What is the remedy for this condition of things? As we indicated some time ago—though such a remedy would be at least a most unfortunate necessity—to give the House the power of closing its debate whenever the majority decided that the discussion had lasted long enough would effect something. It would, first of all, probably compel members to take some pains with the speeches they did make, as they would certainly have lawer opportunities of speaking at all. And it would curtait very much the diffuse and unimpressive "tail." But it would hardly restore the habit of reticence, the modesty which keeps stence from self-diffuse and unimpressive "tail." But it would hardly restore the habit of reticence, the modesty which keeps stence from self-diffuse and unimpressive "tail." But it would hardly restore the habit of reticence, the modesty which keeps stence from self-diffuse and unimpressive "tail." But it would have a stence from self-diffuse and unimpressive "tail." But it would have a stence from self-diffuse and unimpressive "tail." But it would have tailed to the flower which inspires the carnest desire to merit its good opinion. There are states of mind which, we fear, the tendency of all things towards a common-place average is effacing, and which we shall not find it easy to restore. But this we may feel sure of—that any measure which tends to restore the self-respect of the House of Commons will tend also to restore its influence over its individual members. Of late, it has lost much in self-respect. It has felt its own control over individual opinion growing less; and in the very conactousness of its own loss of control, it has lost, of course, something of the dignity and spirit which gave that control. The power to silence talk that is mere talk, or worse than mere talk—talk devised with a mischierous purpose—would be of some use even in restoring to the House that sense of its own power which must always be at the heart of true dignity.

At 5 o'clock P. M., we will sell, upon the premises, the BEAUTIFUL LOT situated as above, and adjoining the residence of Mr. T. A. Parker.

It fromts 67 2-12 feet on Franklin street and runs back 153/j feet to an after twenty feet wide.

Its size makes it suitable for a fine residence with a side for attached, or for two dwellings, or for a block of three, and it will be sold as a whole or in such subdivisions as bidders may desire.

The situation is in the misst of the handsomest improvements and the most desirable neighborhood on west Franklin street. Trey have all the city improvements, and offer every inducement te those seeking beautiful sites for residences.

We call especial attention to the fact that they are amongst the very few lots now to be had on Franklin street between the Capitol Square and Mouroe Park.
